FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE

INTRODUCTION

The cases in this multi-district litigation ("MDL") proceeding raise claims closely related to those raised in the pending appeal in Hepting et al. v. AT&T et al., 439 F. Supp. 2d 974 (N.D. Cal. 2006), a case that challenges: (i) alleged warrantless surveillance of Plaintiffs conducted by the National Security Agency with the alleged assistance of defendant telecommunication carriers; and (ii) the alleged provision of telephone communications records to NSA by the defendant carriers. In that appeal, the Ninth Circuit will decide whether any such claims may proceed or whether the state secrets privilege doctrine requires their dismissal, and will therefore directly address a number of issues that arise in both Hepting and the remaining MDL cases—including whether there should be further proceedings at all. Rushing to decide the same claims and state secrets privilege assertion in those other cases while the Hepting appeal is pending would not only impose substantial and unnecessary burdens, but would also present the very risks associated with protecting state secrets in litigation. Plaintiffs' position, which includes taking significant discovery that Plaintiffs concede would require reasserting precisely the same state secrets privilege claim at issue in Hepting, is nothing more than an invitation to engage in inefficient and potentially harmful proceedings that will not materially advance these cases.

Plaintiffs begin by framing the standard of review incorrectly and, as a consequence of that error, proceed along several meritless tangents. Plaintiffs first argue erroneously that, to obtain a stay, the Government must satisfy the standards for obtaining an injunction. But the Government is not seeking injunctive relief, nor to stay any injunctive order of this Court. The standards that apply to injunctive relief play no role where a party seeks to stay district court proceedings pending the outcome of a parallel proceeding that may resolve closely related issues.

Proceeding from the wrong standards, Plaintiffs next contend that a stay cannot be entered in the non-Hepting cases because the litigants there are not parties to the Hepting appeal and, thus, cannot demonstrate that they are likely to prevail in that appeal. This argument is specious. Neither logic nor case law forecloses the Government and non-Hepting defendants from obtaining a stay of all the MDL cases based on the close correlation between the issues they raise and the Hepting appeal, wholly apart from standards for injunctive relief.

The balance of Plaintiffs' opposition is devoted almost entirely to the Hepting case and proposes myriad discovery and other steps directed at AT&T, notwithstanding the pending appeal. As the United States has previously demonstrated, all of Plaintiffs' proposed activities implicate the key issues on appeal, including but not limited to whether the case must be dismissed at the outset under the Totten doctrine, see Totten v. United States, 92 U.S. 105 (1875), and state secrets privilege; whether Plaintiffs' standing can be established without state secrets confirming or denying whether they are subject to surveillance activities; and whether evidence needed to decide the claims on the merits implicates state secrets.

With respect to such activities in Hepting itself, the Hepting appeal has divested the Court of jurisdiction to proceed as Plaintiffs propose. And to the extent Plaintiffs propose such activities in cases other than Hepting (it is hardly clear from their brief that they do), the Government should not be put to the burdens and risks of re-asserting the state secrets privilege as to the very same issues now on appeal up to the point of actual disclosure of state secrets. The Court of Appeals is presently considering whether (and how) the state secrets at issue in these cases should be protected, and whether further proceedings to adjudicate the claims at issue are appropriate. The burdens and harms on the Government and carrier defendants of proceeding as Plaintiffs propose far outweigh Plaintiffs' speculative allegations of harm.[1] These cases should therefore be stayed pending the Hepting appeal.

ARGUMENT

I. THE GOVERNMENT HAS SATISFIED THE PROPER LEGAL STANDARD FOR A STAY OF PROCEEDINGS.

A. The Standards for Injunctive Relief Do Not Apply Here.

Plaintiffs erroneously contend that the standard for obtaining injunctive relief applies whenever a party seeks a stay of proceedings pending resolution of related issues on appeal.

[1] As the Government recently notified the Court, any electronic surveillance that was occurring as part of the Terrorist Surveillance Program ("TSP") will now be conducted subject to the approval of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, and the President has decided not to reauthorize the TSP. See Notice by the United States of Attorney General's Letter to Congress (Dkt. No. 127, Jan. 17, 2007)).

They are wrong. Those standards apply where a stay application seeks or would have the effect of injunctive relief, such as when a party seeks to stay the injunctive effect of an order pending appeal. Where that circumstance is not present, a party seeking to stay proceedings pending the outcome of a related appellate proceeding need not satisfy the standards for injunctive relief. Instead, as the Supreme Court has observed, "[a] trial court may, with propriety, find it is efficient for its own docket and the fairest course for the parties to enter a stay of an action before it, pending resolution of independent proceedings which bear upon the case." See Landis v. North American Co., 299 U.S. 248, 254 (1936); see also Levya v. Certified Growers of California, Ltd., 593 F.2d 857, 863 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 827 (1979); Mediterranean Enterprises, Inc. v. Ssangyong Corp., 708 F.2d 1458, 1465 (9th Cir. 1983). While the parties may dispute how the Court should weigh the competing considerations, the notion that injunctive standards apply to the question is wrong.[2]

B. The Non-Hepting Cases Should Be Stayed Pending the Hepting Appeal.

Plaintiffs next proffer an untenable theory as to why the non-Hepting cases should not be stayed. Plaintiffs contend that "because the non-AT&T cases are not under appeal, it is impossible for the non-movants to meet the likelihood-of-success standard for a stay pending appeal in those cases, since they obviously have no likelihood of a successful appeal where no appeal is pending." See Pls. Opp. at 8 (original emphasis). This contention is clearly wrong. A movant need not be a party to a parallel appellate proceeding to obtain a stay of its own related proceeding. The Government and non-Hepting movants most surely can obtain a stay of the non-Hepting MDL cases on the ground that Hepting raises similar issues that may simplify issues of fact or law in the MDL cases, and that further proceedings in the meantime may be unduly burdensome, ultimately rendered unnecessary, or may harm the movant's interests. See Lockyer v. Mirant Corp., 398 F.3d 1098, 1110 (9th Cir. 2004) (citing CMAX, Inc. v. Hall, 300 F.2d 265 (9th Cir. 1962)). Indeed, if Plaintiffs were correct, a party could never seek a stay pending proceedings in another related matter—which is simply not the law. Moreover, the very purpose of MDL proceedings "is to prevent inconsistent pretrial rulings (particularly with respect to matters involving national security), and conserve the resources of the parties, their counsel and the judiciary." See In re: National Security Agency Telecommunications Record Litigation, 444 F. Supp. 2d 1332, 1334 (J. P. M. L. 2006). The Court undoubtedly has authority to grant the stay relief requested by the non-Hepting defendants.

[2] The cases on which Plaintiffs rely are inapposite. In Abassi v. Immigration and Naturalization Service, 143 F.3d 513 (9th Cir. 1998), the party seeking a stay pending appeal sought to halt the operation of a deportation order—very clearly invoking the injunctive powers of the court. Likewise, in United States v. Milligan, 324 F. Supp. 2d 1062 (D. Ariz. 2004), the party seeking a stay sought to halt enforcement of a subpoena—again clearly an issue of injunctive relief. In WCI Cable, Inc. v. Alaska Railroad Corp., 285 B.R. 476 (D. Ore. 2002), the district court declined to stay further proceedings in a bankruptcy dispute pending its own review of an appeal from the Bankruptcy Court concerning whether the defendants in that case had immunity. But a key reason the court denied the stay motion was precisely because, if it ruled against defendants' immunity claim, district court proceedings would then be stayed pending appeal to the Ninth Circuit.

II. THE COURT LACKS JURISDICTION TO PROCEED IN HEPTING.

Not until the end of their opposition, after an extensive discussion of specific discovery they believe should proceed in Hepting, do Plaintiffs address the threshold issue of whether the Court even has jurisdiction to proceed in that case.[3] As Plaintiffs must acknowledge, an interlocutory appeal divests the district court of jurisdiction as to the particular issues involved in the appeal. City of Los Angeles Harbor Division v. Santa Monica Baykeeper, 254 F.3d 882, 885 (9th Cir. 2001) (citing Griggs v. Provident Consumer Discount Co., 459 U.S. 56, 58 (1982); see also Britton v. Co-Op Banking Group, 916 F.2d 1405, 1411 (9th Cir. 1990). Thus, the question is not whether the Court has lost jurisdiction in Hepting (it plainly has), but as to what issues.

Plaintiffs contend that the only jurisdictional bar on further proceedings in Hepting is that the Court cannot reconsider its order denying the Government's motion to dismiss. See Pls. Opp. at 38-39. Plaintiffs' analysis is again wrong.[4] The Ninth Circuit held long ago, in the very context of an interlocutory appeal as to privileged information, that a district court cannot [3] The Government does not contend that the Court has been divested of jurisdiction in the other MDL cases by virtue of the Hepting appeal.

[4] To the extent Plaintiffs contend that the Court would be precluded from upholding any further state secrets privilege assertions in Hepting if the case proceeds, on the ground that this would "reconsider" its prior order, that obviously is specious.

proceed to consider substantially the same issue of privilege that is pending on appeal. United States v. Thorp, 655 F.2d 997, 999 (9th Cir. 1981) (district court cannot hold attorney in civil contempt for protecting attorney-client privileged information where interlocutory appeal pending as to whether same attorney protecting same information should be held in criminal contempt). The law is clear that a district court can proceed only as to "independent issues presented in the underlying case." Britton, 916 F.2d at 1405 (emphasis added); Jago v. United States District Court, 570 F.2d 618, 622 (6th Cir. 1978) (matter proceeding in district "did not in any way relate to" matter pending on appeal); Grauberger v. St. Francis Hospital, 169 F. Supp. 2d 1172, 1175 n.2 (N.D. Cal. 2001) (further proceedings in district court "does not implicate" issues raised on interlocutory appeal). This well-established rule is an important jurisdictional doctrine intended to "prevent confusion and inefficiency that would result if both the district court and the court of appeals were adjudicating the same issues simultaneously." Id. (finding jurisdiction over Rule 11 motion for fees because it was "uniquely separable" from merits issues on appeal).

Yet proceeding in Hepting on the very same issues that are presently before the Court of Appeals is precisely what Plaintiffs propose. For example, Plaintiffs once again demand the right to obtain discovery as to AT&T's alleged participation in the alleged surveillance activities, including discovery into allegations about an AT&T facility. Plaintiffs also demand an answer to the Hepting Complaint, which repeatedly raises allegations as to AT&T's alleged assistance to NSA. Plaintiffs also contend that discovery can proceed with respect to any alleged certification that AT&T may have received from the Government. See Pls. Opp. at 32-35. But the propriety of taking these steps, rather than dismissing the case, is the ultimate issue on appeal, and thus it cannot reasonably be disputed that these are the "particular matters involved in the appeal," and are not "independent" or "uniquely separable" from those issues. And the mere fact that the Court would adjudicate but not actually order disclosure of privileged information does not somehow render the same privilege assertion distinct from the matters on appeal.

Further proceedings in Hepting would also be inappropriate because the threshold question of whether the Hepting Plaintiffs actually have standing has not been—and cannot be—adjudicated without addressing the state secrets issues now on appeal. See USG Stay Mem. (Dkt. 67) at 13-14. It would be wholly inappropriate to permit discovery in Hepting in the meantime.

III. A STAY PENDING THE HEPTING APPEAL IS APPROPRIATE IN HEPTING AND ALL CASES IN THIS MDL PROCEEDING.

Assuming, arguendo, that the Court has jurisdiction to undertake further proceedings in Hepting, a stay pending appeal is warranted in that case as well as in the other MDL cases. As the United States has previously demonstrated, the issues of proof and questions of law would be simplified by a stay, and the respective harms the parties may face by a stay or further proceedings tips substantially in the United States' favor. See Lockyer, 398 F.3d at 1110. Indeed, this is essentially the course already chosen by the Ninth Circuit with respect to Al-Haramain v. NSA, 451 F. Supp. 2d 1215 (D. Ore. 2006), in which the Ninth Circuit granted the United States' 1292(b) petition but, recognizing the relevancy of Hepting, stayed briefing of the Al-Haramain appeal.

A. The Key Issues Raised in the Hepting Appeal Will Have A Direct Bearing on Further MDL Proceedings.

As the United States has already demonstrated, see USG Stay Mem (Dkt 67) at 11-16, the Hepting appeal will address several issues critical to the resolution of the MDL cases, including:

* Whether disclosure of any carrier-NSA relationship in connection with an intelligence matter is foreclosed by the Totten doctrine.

* Whether the state secrets privilege precludes disclosure of information pertaining to whether any plaintiff has been subject to NSA surveillance activities and, thus, forecloses them from establishing their standing.

* Whether the evidence necessary to resolve the issues arising in these cases inherently risks the disclosure of state secrets, warranting dismissal at the outset.

* Whether any relationship between a telecommunications carrier and the National Security Agency can be confirmed or denied under the state secrets privilege.

* Whether the state secrets privilege turns on whether the Governments has set forth in its public and in camera, ex parte submissions a reasonable basis that harm to national security would flow from disclosure of the information at issue.

* Whether the state secrets privilege precludes disclosure of information concerning intelligence sources and methods necessary to resolve claims on the merits challenging alleged electronic surveillance and the alleged collection of call records information.

While the particular parties and circumstances of each MDL case may differ to some extent from Hepting, any one of the foregoing issues would be applicable to the similar issues raised in the MDL cases and could not only dispose of Hepting but each of the MDL cases. At the very least, resolution of these issues will likely simplify the various questions presented by the MDL cases. It makes little sense to "tee-up" these issues now in this Court, as Plaintiffs propose, since further proceedings may either be entirely unnecessary or fail to account for any decision by the Court of Appeals and, thus, not advance proceedings at all. As the Court has already found in certifying the Hepting Order for interlocutory appeal, "the state secrets issues resolved herein represent controlling questions of law as to which there is a substantial ground for difference of opinion, and [] an immediate appeal may materially advance ultimate termination of the litigation." See Hepting, 439 F. Supp. 2d at 1011 (emphasis added).[5]

[5] Plaintiffs discussion of recent decisions in related NSA litigation is inaccurate and does not warrant denying a stay. The court in ACLU v. NSA,439 F. Supp. 2d 974 (E.D. MI 2006) (appeal pending), upheld the Government's state secrets privilege assertion but entered judgment for plaintiffs based on publicly available information about the TSP. The posture of that case supports a stay here, since another circuit court (which heard oral argument on January 31, 2007) will shortly opine on the proper disposition of the state secrets privilege in a case raising similar issues. The court's decision in Al-Haramain v. NSA, 451 F. Supp. 2d 1215 (D. Ore. 2006) (interlocutory appeal pending), was similar to this Court's decision in Hepting, in which the Government's motion to dismiss was denied, while a final ruling on disposition of the case under the state secrets privilege was reserved. As in Hepting, the court certified its decision for interlocutory review. A motion to stay further district court proceedings in Al-Haramain was fully briefed and pending at the time that case was transferred to this MDL proceeding. Now that an appeal has been taken in Al-Haramain, this Court would be divested of jurisdiction in that case to consider the subject of the district court's order there—whether the case should proceed in the face of a state secrets privilege assertion. (The Ninth Circuit itself has stayed briefing in Al-Haramain pending disposition of the Hepting appeal.) In Terkel v. AT&T Corp., 441 F. Supp. 2d 899 (N.D. Ill. 2006), the court upheld the Government's state secrets privilege assertion with respect to Plaintiffs' allegations that AT&T provided call records information to NSA, finding that the privilege precluded the Plaintiffs' ability to establish standing. This also supports a stay here, since the identical issue is presented by the Hepting appeal.

B. The Balance of Harms Favors a Stay of Proceedings.

Plaintiffs' contention that the balance of hardships favors denial of a stay is without merit. Plaintiffs' allegation that they currently face a "dragnet" of ongoing surveillance of virtually all domestic and international communications is of course highly speculative and unfounded. To deny a stay pending appeal based on these mere allegations, where one of the very issues on appeal is whether these allegations can be adjudicated consistent with the state secrets privilege, would be unfounded.[6]

Beyond this, to the extent this asserted harm is based, at least in part, on the ongoing existence of warrantless surveillance under the Terrorist Surveillance Program, that aspect of their harm no longer exists since, as the Attorney General has indicated, any electronic surveillance that was occurring under the TSP is now occurring under orders of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court. See Notice, supra (Dkt 127).[7] Moreover, to the extent Plaintiffs' allegation of harm turns on the alleged collection of telephone records information, the Court previously decided against discovery into that matter, see Hepting, 439 F. Supp. 2d at 997-98, and nothing warrants further proceedings now on the issue pending appeal.[8] As to any

[6] The authority on which Plaintiffs rely to argue that the violation of a statute or constitutional right establishes irreparable harm concerned actions that are known and violations that have been established. See, e.g., Gomez v. Vernon, 255 F. 3d 1118, 1129 (9th Cir.) (affirming injunctive where the record after a nineteen day trial demonstrated prison inmates had been subject to unconstitutional retaliation), cert. denied, 534 U.S. 1066 (2001); Silver Sage Partners Ltd. v. City of Desert Hot Springs, 251 F.3d 814, 827 (9th Cir. 2001) (where jury found violation of Fair Housing Act, irreparable harm established for a permanent injunction); Smallwood v. National Can Company, 583 F.2d 419, 420 (9th Cir. 1978) (permanent injunction issued in retaliation claim where district court found retaliatory intent). A party does not show irreparable harm merely by alleging a statutory or constitutional right has been violated.

[7] The Government's opening brief in the Hepting appeal is currently due on February 23, 2007, and will address the impact of the FISC orders on that case. We defer further discussion of how those orders will impact further MDL proceedings until after our Court of Appeals' filing.

[8] The Court also found that reliance on hearsay in media reports to decide the key issues here is inappropriate. See Hepting, 439 F. Supp. 2d at 991. Such media reports cannot and do not undermine the state secrets privilege assertion now on appeal. Even when alleged facts have been the "subject of widespread media and public speculation" based on "[u]nofficial leaks and public surmise," those alleged facts are not actually established in the public domain. See Afshar alleged harms beyond these two claims, Plaintiffs have not proposed that their claims be adjudicated to conclusion, only that some effort to be made to advance proceedings in the event of a remand in Hepting. But there is no assurance that any proceedings will materially advance the litigation, and, thus, resolution of Plaintiffs' remaining alleged harms, since the outcome of the Hepting appeal is not known. Depending on how the Court of Appeals rules, further proceedings may prove to be futile and fail to advance the process at all.

With respect to the countervailing harms faced by the Government and telecommunication carrier defendants, Plaintiffs contend that no harm would arise from any further proceedings because the Government may simply renews its state secrets privilege assertion, either as to specific discovery demands in Hepting or through motions to dismiss and discovery in the MDL cases. See Pls. Opp. at 17-18. But aside from the unnecessary burden of repeating the state secrets privilege process in Hepting and the other MDL cases, Plaintiffs' proposal would impose real and immediate harms, not conjectural ones. Plaintiffs propose an array of activities in Hepting that would directly implicate the state secrets privilege including answering a complaint that repeatedly alleges that AT&T assisted NSA in intelligence activities;[9] discovery into allegations by Mr. Klein concerning NSA's alleged use of an AT&T v. Department of State, 702 F.2d 1125, 1130-31 (D.C. Cir. 1983). To the contrary, where such public speculation is widespread, forcing an "official acknowledgment [or denial] by an authoritative source" can "cause damage to the national security," which is not required. Id. This is true regardless of whether the statements come from a member of the legislative branch who reportedly was provided with certain information or others. See Terkel, 441 F. Supp. 2d at 914 ("Treating confidential statements to Congressional representatives as public disclosures that make an otherwise secret activity a matter of public knowledge would undermine the state secrets privilege by forcing the executive branch to give up the privilege whenever it discusses classified activities with members of Congress."). Authority permitting a party to use hearsay evidence when it seeks emergency injunctive relief is plainly inapposite here. See Flynt Distributing Co. v. Harvey, 734 F. 2d 1389, 1394 (9th Cir. 1984) (only when the urgency of obtaining preliminary injunction exists, where it is difficult to obtain timely affidavits from persons who would be competent to testify at trial, may the trial court give inadmissible evidence some weight for the purpose of preventing irreparable harm before trial). Indeed, a key issue on appeal in Hepting is whether evidence can be received on these issues.

[9] Plaintiffs' demand that AT&T provide an answer to the complaint, see Pls. Opp. at 32-33, is especially pointless, not only because the Court certified whether a motion to dismiss that very complaint should have been granted, but because no benefit would be served by an ex parte, facility; discovery into whether AT&T (or any carrier) has received certifications to assist NSA in intelligence matters; and so on. Such matters go to the core state secrets issues on appeal, and if such discovery were permitted could moot all or a substantial part of the appeal.

As the Court is aware, the process involved in asserting the state secrets privilege (whether in response to specific discovery requests or in connection with a dispositive motion) is complex, extremely sensitive, and requires substantial care. Despite the closest adherence to secure procedures, merely litigating disputes even before disclosure is finally ordered, or indeed even if it is never ordered, can risk real harm. Any information in the parties' filings or judicial opinions—even matters that seem innocuous to those unaware of the actual facts—could tend to reveal details that might confirm or deny what is a state secret and thereby causing potentially grave harm to national security. The broad attention that litigation of this nature draws heightens the risk of proceeding by amplifying all that is said and done. The physical task of preparing, securing, and transmitting files also poses risks of disclosure at different stages. It is not conjectural that these risks will be incurred if these cases are permitted to proceed; opening the door to such risks makes little sense while an appeal is pending that may close it (or substantially limit any further inquiry). See Sterling v. Tenet, 416 F.3d 338, 344 (4th Cir. 2005), cert. denied, 126 S. Ct. 1052 (2006) (courts are "not required to play with fire and chance further disclosure—inadvertent, mistaken, or even intentional—that would defeat the very purpose for which the privilege exists.").

IV. FISA SECTION 1806(f) IS INAPPLICABLE HERE.

Plaintiffs also argue (at inordinate length) that the availability of Section 106 of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 ("FISA"), as amended, codified at 50 U.S.C. § 1806(f), weighs against a stay because this provision can be utilized to resolve disputes over classified information in further proceedings. See Pls. Opp. at 18-22; 3, 9, 32-36. Since a short reply does not permit a full response on this important question, the Court should receive in camera answer where the Government has already apprised the Court of the underlying privileged facts at stake, and the process of redaction presents significant risks. See Case Joint Case Management Statement (Dkt. 61-1) at 31 (Government's Position on Hepting Answer).

separate briefing on the matter if further proceedings are not stayed. For now, United States briefly summarizes its position as to why Section 1806(f) does not apply in this case.

As the United States has previously demonstrated, viewed in its proper context, Section 1806(f) is part of a statutory scheme that provides a "procedural mechanism by which [FISA] information may be used in formal proceedings." Sen. R. No. 95-701, 95th Cong., 2d Sess., at 62 (1978), 1978 U.S.C.C. & A.N. 3973, 4031. Section 1806(f) addresses cases in which the Government intends to use FISA information against an "aggrieved person" and establishes a procedure that may be invoked by the Government if a litigant seeks to suppress the fruits of FISA collection or obtain disclosure of FISA applications, orders or other related information. Contrary to Plaintiffs' characterization, Section 1806(f) is a grant of authority to the Government enabling it to invoke special ex parte, in camera review procedures in defending against challenges to the Government's use of evidence drawn from FISA surveillance. This provision applies in three circumstances: (i) when a governmental entity gives notice under Section 1806(c) or (d) that it intends to use evidence obtained from such surveillance against the aggrieved person; (ii) when the aggrieved person seeks to suppress that evidence under Section 1806(e); and/or (iii) when the aggrieved person moves or requests "to discover or obtain" FISA "applications, orders or other materials" related to the surveillance or the evidence or information derived from the surveillance. See 50 U.S.C. § 1806(f). Section 1806(f) may be invoked "if the Attorney General files an affidavit under oath that disclosure or an adversary hearing would harm the national security of the United States." See id. A district court would then consider, in camera and ex parte, classified materials as may be necessary to determine whether the surveillance of the aggrieved person was lawfully authorized and conducted. See id.

The threshold issue raised by Plaintiffs' reliance on Section 1806(f) is whether it may even be applied in civil cases, such as Hepting and the pending MDL cases, where alleged unlawful surveillance has never been confirmed or denied and, indeed, is subject to a state secrets privilege assertion. Plaintiffs take one phrase in section 1806(f) out of its statutory context and argue that the provision provides independent authority to seek materials related to electronic surveillance under FISA or otherwise through a motion in any civil proceeding. See Pls. Opp. at 21. Nothing supports this reading.

In the first place, for Section 1806(f) to apply, a person must be "aggrieved" as defined by FISA— that is, the person must be "the target of an electronic surveillance any other person whose communications or activities were subject to surveillance." 50 U.S.C. § 1801(k). Turning the statute on its head, Plaintiffs read Section 1806(f) to permit discovery into the very issue of whether someone is an aggrieved person within the meaning of FISA. Plaintiffs would thus transform this provision into an engine for anyone to discover whether they have been subject to surveillance by filing a suit and a motion to compel. Plaintiffs do not cite a single case in support of this radical theory. All of the reported cases that we have found apply section 1806(f) where the United States or State government has sought to use evidence related to electronic surveillance in judicial proceedings and is responding to a suppression motion, or has invoked 1806(f) to protect against the unauthorized disclosure of FISA applications, orders and related information.[10] In addition, all of the courts addressing motions to disclose or suppress FISA evidence reached a conclusion as to the legality of the surveillance based on an in camera and ex parte review.[11] Thus, Plaintiffs' suggestion that Section 1806(f) be use to grant them access to classified materials is unfounded and contrary to established law barring such access.

In addition, the fact that Section 1806(f) applies to civil challenges to alleged unlawful surveillance, see Pls. Opp. at 21-22 (citing H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 95-1740, 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 4048, 4061 (Oct. 5. 1978), does not mean the provision authorizes discovery of whether such surveillance has in fact occurred.[12] The D.C. Circuit's decision in ACLU Foundation v. Barr, 952 F.2d 457 (D.C. Cir. 1991), is instructive on this issue, and Plaintiffs' attempt to distinguish Barr is meritless. Plaintiffs contend that Barr holds only "that the particular facts of the individual case supported the conclusion that disclosure to the aggrieved person was not necessary." Pls. Opp. at 22. That is not so. The court in Barr held that the plaintiffs who merely alleged ongoing surveillance were not entitled to use FISA procedures to discover whether they were in fact subject to surveillance. The case arose out of deportation proceedings in which the United States had acknowledged that six individuals had been subject to FISA surveillance. See id. at 458-59. The United States later petitioned the United States District Court for Central District of California for a determination on the legality of the FISA surveillance under Section 1806(f) and the district court upheld the lawfulness of the surveillance under that provision. See United States v. Hamide, 914 F.2d 1147 (9th Cir. 1990). The six individuals who had been subject to the prior acknowledged surveillance, and eight others who alleged continuing surveillance, then filed suit in the District of Columbia.

Distinguishing between the two groups of plaintiffs, the D.C. Circuit held that the six individuals whose surveillance had been upheld in the California §1806(f) proceeding that had been invoked by the Government were barred from raising statutory and constitutional claims attacking the legality of the acknowledged surveillance. With respect to those who alleged ongoing surveillance that had not been acknowledged, the D.C. Circuit reversed dismissal of their claims on the ground that the claims should have been resolved under Rule 56 summary judgment proceedings, not under Rule 12(b)(6). See Barr, 952 F.2d. at 469.

But the court in Barr agreed that FISA did not permit discovery into whether surveillance had occurred, noting that "if the government is forced to admit or deny such allegations, in an answer to the complaint or otherwise, it will have disclosed sensitive information that may compromise critical foreign intelligence activities." Id. at 469 & n.13 ("The government makes the point, with which we agree, that under FISA it has no duty to reveal ongoing foreign intelligence surveillance"). See also In re Grand Jury Investigation, 431 F. Supp.2d 584 (E.D.Va. 2006) (denying notice under FISA Section 1806(c) of whether grand jury witnesses had been subject to the Terrorist Surveillance Program, as well as notice under 18 U.S.C. § 3502(a) since witnesses had made no prima facie showing that they were an "aggrieved persons" under that provision); In re Sealed Case, 310 F.3d 717, 741 (For. Intel. Surv. Rev. 2002) (FISA does not require notice to a person whose communications were intercepted unless the government "intends to enter into evidence or otherwise use or disclose" such communications in a trial or other enumerated official proceedings;" otherwise "'the need to preserve secrecy for sensitive counterintelligence sources and methods justifies elimination of the notice requirement.'") (citing Senate Report 95-701, 95th Cong., 2d Sess., at 12 (1978), 1978 U.S.C.C.& A.N. 3973, 3980); In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 856 F.2d 685, 688 (4th Cir. 1988) (grand jury witness not entitled to notice of alleged surveillance under FISA Section 1806(c)).[13]

[12] Likewise, nothing supports the notion that Section 1806(f) applies generally to any proceeding in a civil case that might involve classified information, such as merely answering the complaint, as Plaintiffs' contend, see Pls. Opp. at 32-33.

In addition, nothing in Section 1806(f) or its legislative history demonstrates any intention on the part of Congress to preclude the Government from asserting the state secrets privilege to protect the disclosure of national security information, including information that would confirm whether a particular individual was subject to electronic surveillance as defined in FISA. As the Supreme Court has instructed, "[i]t is a well-established principle of statutory construction that '[t]he common law . . . ought not to be deemed repealed, unless the language of a statute be clear and explicit for this purpose.'" Norfolk Redevelopment and Housing Authority v. Chesapeake and Potomac Telephone Co. of Norfolk, 464 U.S. 30, 35-36 (1983) (citation omitted). Plaintiffs' contention that Section 1806(f) supercedes the state secrets privilege because it applies "notwithstanding any other law" is specious. That is hardly the kind of clear expression required to abrogate a constitutionally-based power of the Executive. Indeed, the legislative history of the FISA does not indicate that the phrase "notwithstanding any other provision of law" in Section 1806(f) was meant to supplant a long-standing, well known, constitutionally-based privilege held by the Executive to protect national security information whenever a motion is filed in any case to discover the existence of surveillance. On the contrary, Section 1806(f) is a shield that may be invoked by the Government, not a sword that can be used by an "inventive litigant" to avoid Section 1806(f) by relying on "a new statute, rule or judicial construction" or other sources of law when challenging the legality of surveillance. See S. Rep. No. 95-701, 95th Cong., 2d Session, at 64 (1978), 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 3973, 4033.

[13] Indeed, on the point that it reversed the district court, the D.C. Circuit in Barr held that, in a Rule 56 summary judgment proceeding, "the government would need only assert that plaintiffs do not have sufficient evidence to carry their burden of proving ongoing surveillance . . . ." Barr, 952 F.2d at 469. The court could not have reached this result if the Plaintiffs reading of Section 1806(f) were correct. Rather, the court found that only if the plaintiffs could defeat summary judgment might Section 1806(f) apply. See id. Among the issues raised by the Government in its motion for summary judgment in Hepting is that the fact of any surveillance of Plaintiffs could not be confirmed or denied. Under Barr, only if the state secrets privilege were rejected on summary judgment, and surveillance acknowledged, would Section 1806(f) apply.

Accordingly, since a key issue in the Hepting appeal is whether the Government's state secrets privilege assertion should be upheld, Section 1806(f) could not be utilized until after the Hepting appeal is resolved in any event because that privilege assertion encompasses information concerning whether any plaintiff in this MDL proceeding is actually subject to surveillance and, thus, sufficiently aggrieved as defined in FISA to permit use of Section 1806(f).

CONCLUSION

Plaintiffs' opposition presents no basis in fact or law for undertaking further proceedings in Hepting and the other cases in this MDL proceeding. For the foregoing reasons, the United States' motion to stay MDL proceedings should be granted.[14]

[14] If transferred to this MDL proceeding, the United States does not oppose disposition of lawsuits initiated by the United States against state government entities regarding their authority to investigate the alleged assistance of telecommunications carriers in alleged NSA activities. See Case Joint Case Management Statement (Dkt. 61-1) at 34-35 & n.22 (Government's Position on Federal-state actions). The Judicial Panel on Multi-district Litigation heard argument on transferring these actions on January 25, 2007, and is expected to rule shortly.
